

ATP—The Free Energy Carrier

How does the ATP molecule capture, store, and release energy?

Model 1: In sporting events, teams might compete to see who can lift the greatest amount of weight. Each time a team lifts more weight than the other, a judge is awarded a point. That is why people often carry around dumbbells, medicine balls, or barbells during their workouts. The same concept is used for the energy transformations in cells. Cells need energy (from sunlight) to do their work of carrying out functions, and they need to capture and store energy. In fact, we can think of energy as being like money. Cells need molecules that store energy for their work because all of their functions require energy. Just as cells store energy in the small molecule of ATP, there is an analogy for a cell bank for your cells' energy accounts.

Model 1 — Adenosine Triphosphate (ATP)

1. The diagrammed ATP molecule is made of three parts. Use your knowledge of biomolecules to label the three parts and explain why each is a "building block" molecule, such as "phosphate groups" below.

First part is adenine, the second part is ribose sugar, and the third part is three phosphate groups.

2. Label the third part. What is missing by the "A" in the name Adenosine Triphosphate?

The missing third is three phosphate groups.
