THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO

"The first step in the process of developing a business plan is to determine the nature of the business and the market it will serve. This involves identifying the products or services to be offered, the target market, and the competitive environment. Once these elements are established, the next step is to conduct a thorough market analysis. This includes gathering data on market size, growth potential, and customer needs. The analysis should also consider the strengths and weaknesses of the business and its competitors. With this information, the entrepreneur can then develop a marketing strategy and a financial plan. The financial plan should outline the expected revenues, expenses, and profits over a period of time. Finally, the business plan should be reviewed and revised as needed to ensure it accurately reflects the current state of the business and the market."
