While an education should not be denied, the testimony that such programs are not "gender specific" is not enough. The authors find that the program's impact on women did not depend on their initial level of education. For women, the program's impact was strongest for women with less than a high school education, and weaker for women with a high school diploma or more than a high school diploma. This suggests that the program's impact was strongest for women with the least education, and that the program's impact was weaker for women with more education. This suggests that the program's impact was strongest for women with the least education, and that the program's impact was weaker for women with more education.
