

PHENOMENOLOGICAL RESEARCH DESIGN PROCESS

What is a Phenomenological Research Design?

- Phenomenological research design is a qualitative approach or qualitative research methodology that focuses on exploring and describing the lived experiences of individuals regarding a specific phenomenon.
- This qualitative research method aims to uncover the essence of these experiences by examining participants' perceptions, feelings, and interpretations.

1. Formulating Research Question

- Develop open-ended questions that will guide your exploration of the phenomenon. These should focus on participants' lived experiences and perceptions.
- The developed research questions, aims and objectives should be inline with the targeted purpose of the study and significance of the conducted research.

2. Choose a Phenomenological Approach

- Choose a phenomenological approach: Select either descriptive (focusing on describing experiences) or interpretive (aiming to interpret the meaning of experiences) phenomenology based on your research goals.
- Identify and recruit participants who have directly experienced the phenomenon under study. Use purposive sampling to ensure rich, relevant data.

3. Collecting and Analyzing Data

- Conduct in-depth, semi-structured interviews with participants. These interviews should be open-ended, allowing participants to describe their experiences freely. Consider using additional data sources like written accounts or observations.
- Conduct a thorough data analysis process to identify key themes describing the research problem under investigation.

4. Synthesizing Information

- Ensure the trustworthiness of your findings through member checking (having participants review and confirm your interpretations) and peer debriefing.

5. Drawing Conclusions and Presenting Findings

- Present your findings in a rich, descriptive narrative that captures the essence of the phenomenon and incorporates participants' voices through quotes.
- Consider the implications of your findings for theory, practice, and future research. Acknowledge the limitations of your study.
