The equality between the general and the particular cases, however, is not true. For example, if the first left equality holds, then the second left equality does not hold in general. In the example above, making the first left equality hold by adding a constant to each generation's utility, say, by 100,000, does not automatically imply that the second left equality holds. In the example above, the second left equality holds only if the constant added to each generation's utility is zero. The second right equality also does not hold in general.
