As the temperature decreases, the rate of convection within the mantle will also decrease. This could be the slowest-moving force in the long-term evolution of the Earth's interior, as the other two forces are thought to have been far more effective in driving the convection of the young Earth. Current estimates therefore suggest a period of 40 to 50 minutes that would be enough for the coupling of planetary convection at 40 to 50 kilometers. The two estimates for the time scale involved, and the degree of coupling, suggest that the early stages of the convection regime were the product of a period of 40 to 50 minutes, suggesting that the coupling of the mantle to the core and inner regions of the mantle would be
