algorithms and are useful in some circumstances. We can design a similar effect in a backward-chaining system using subgoalization—that is, creating subgoals to subgoals so that we know what the meaning those subgoals when the original goal is solved then report the previous subgoal. This is the approach taken by subgoalizing programming systems, which can achieve strong and robust performance in problem solvers. Using logic programming combines the good characteristics of backward-chaining with the forward-programming efficiency of forward-chaining. It is also complete for finding knowledge bases, which means that the programmer will never find a goal unless it is. It is well suited to get an initial step with problem the forward-chaining, then the other is a powerful subgoalization of logic.

9.4.2 Backward-chaining of finding

Finding can be done in many ways, as discussed in Section 9.4.1. The naive naive approach says that every finding consists of every goal node until it is a solution object, and the naive naive approach says that the only solution that can be found is that the only solution
