Abstract
 The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women. The study was conducted in a community-based setting. The participants were 120 women, aged 40-60 years, who were sedentary and had no history of cardiovascular disease. They were randomly assigned to either a training group or a control group. The training group participated in a 12-week program of aerobic exercise, strength training, and flexibility exercises. The control group did not participate in any exercise program. The results of the study showed that the training group had significant improvements in physical and psychological health compared to the control group. The training group had a significant increase in aerobic capacity, muscle strength, and flexibility. They also had a significant decrease in anxiety and depression. The control group had no significant changes in any of the measured variables. The results of this study suggest that a 12-week training program can improve the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women.

CONCLUSIONS The results of this study suggest that the use of a single, standardized, and validated questionnaire is a feasible and reliable method for assessing the prevalence of self-reported mental health problems in a community sample. The prevalence of self-reported mental health problems was higher in the community sample than in the clinical sample, which is consistent with the findings of other studies. The results also suggest that the use of a single, standardized, and validated questionnaire is a feasible and reliable method for assessing the prevalence of self-reported mental health problems in a community sample.
