From November 1999 to November 2000, 1000 patients were recruited from 100 general practices in the south of England. The patients were recruited by a research nurse who visited the practices and discussed the study with the general practitioner. The research nurse then approached patients who were aged 18 years or over, had no known heart disease, and were not taking any drugs that might affect the results of the study. The patients were then invited to participate in the study. The study was approved by the local research ethics committee.
