

Learning Objectives Define what birth, death, and life expectancy are. Give examples of how these factors are used to describe population growth. Define what the carrying capacity is. Define what density, natality, and growth rates are.

Types of Population Dynamics		Definition	Example
Density-Dependent	Birth rate	A species is considered to be a density-dependent species if its birth rate is affected by its population density.
	Death rate	A species is considered to be a density-dependent species if its death rate is affected by its population density.
	Life expectancy	A species is considered to be a density-dependent species if its life expectancy is affected by its population density.
	Carrying capacity	A species is considered to be a density-dependent species if its carrying capacity is affected by its population density.

Lesson Summary

Describing Populations

Life expectancy is the average number of years a person is expected to live. It is calculated by dividing the number of years a person is expected to live by the number of people in the population.

Change rate is the rate at which a population is changing. It is calculated by dividing the change in population by the change in time. For example, if a population of 1000 people is growing by 50 people per year, the change rate is 50 people per year.

Carrying capacity is the maximum number of individuals that a population can support. It is determined by the amount of resources available in the environment.
