

How to Make Your Own MOONSHINE

Because, let's face it, you were going to ask, right?

1

Run out and get 10 pounds of dried whole kernel corn and put it in a burlap sack.

Now put the sack in a tub or bucket full of tepid water, put the whole thing in a dark, warm place, and leave it alone. After about ten days, check the corn; the kernels should have grown sprouts by now.

Using a large dowel (about like a broomstick) or a rolling pin, proceed to beat hell out of—etc crack—the corn kernels. Crack, don't crush. Every single kernel. Don't complain; you signed on for this.

Remove the sprouted corn, rinse it thoroughly in a colander or something similar, and spread it on a flat surface.

Dump the cracked corn into a large pot and add 5 gallons of boiling water. Using a kitchen thermometer, check the water temperature as it cools. When it reaches 86°F (30°C), add one cup of champagne yeast starter. Mix everything together. You now have mash, and here begins the fermentation process.

Using a funnel, pour your mash into the carboy and seal the air lock. Walk away and don't come back for at least a week; 10 days is better.

Now go buy a "carboy"—a large glass jug with its own airlock. Do this unless you want to make your own airlock, which involves surgical hose, another container, and a lot of extra work, just do it.

Retrieve your mash, which has fermented and become wort or "beer." Strain it through cheesecloth into your brand new still. Assemble the rest of the still. Now comes the fun part.

While you wait, go buy a still. They're available in a number of sizes and models. Or, be prepared to spend upward of $300. Copper is recommended, but stainless steel works fine.

10

Start your fire and slowly (like, over thirty minutes to an hour) bring your beer to a boil. As it boils, watch the thermometer near the condenser on your still when it reaches 120 degrees, start running cold water through the condenser. Place a container under the copper pipe, because it's going to start to drip. Then the drip will become a trickle. You are now making moonshine.

11

Throw out the first quarter cup or so of your "shine." That's called the head and it contains the methanol coming off the mash; hence, it's very bitter. Get rid of it.

12

Check the proof using a hydrometer (one probably came with your still). You're probably going to end up with something that's about 75% alcohol (150 proof). That's stout. You may want to add water until you get your desired strength. (Or not have you had a liver scan lately?) A professional still shiner can tell new whiskey's proof by putting some in a jar, holding the jar horizontally and then holding it still. The larger the beads that form on the surface, the higher the proof. You do not have, and may never acquire, that kind of expertise. Use the hydrometer.

13

Siphon your whiskey off into your own bottles or jars. After that, you're on your own.

For a REALLY authentic experience, don't get a permit and perform these steps in the deep woods, after dark, with all your senses on high alert. No! Didn't think so.

DISCLAIMER:

Let's get this out of the way first: Few things on God's green earth are as regulated as the manufacture of beverage alcohol. One of life's little ironies is that it is perfectly legal to own a still, you just can't use it to make whiskey. At least not without a permit (see below). You can distill water, aromatics, and stuff like that, but don't even think of running a single fluid ounce of unpermitted ethanol unless you think you look good in stripes. There are two ways to legalize your distilling operation. One is to obtain a Federal Distilled Spirits Permit, which is what the big commercial guys operate under. This permit is prohibitively expensive and, to get it, you're planning from the get-go to make booze in quantity for public consumption. It's pretty much out of the question. The second option, a sort of nod-and-wink solution, is to get a Federal Fuel Alcohol Permit, which is easy to apply for and has the advantage of being free. But you must tell the government you intend to make your own engine fuel or something similar. Advocates of this procedure say they've never heard of anybody being denied this permit, or of federal agents arriving at your doorstep to make sure your alcohol is going in your lawnmower. But there's always a first time, and you never know when you're going to even potentially, albeit so don't come running to us if the feds come running to you.

Then there are state laws, and they differ widely. In North Carolina, you're also need a state fuel alcohol permit, and some states prohibit distilling equipment altogether, no matter what federal law says. So check.
