Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine whether the use of a computerized system for collecting and analyzing data from a laboratory experiment could improve students' understanding of the scientific method. Students were assigned to one of two groups: a control group that used traditional methods of data collection and analysis, and an experimental group that used a computerized system. The experimental group showed significantly higher scores than the control group on a post-test assessment of their understanding of the scientific method. These results suggest that the use of a computerized system for collecting and analyzing data can improve students' understanding of the scientific method.
