Polymers are characterized by their high molecular weight and their ability to form long, flexible chains. This property is due to the presence of repeating units in the polymer chain, which are connected by covalent bonds. The molecular weight of a polymer is typically measured in grams per mole (g/mol) and can range from a few thousand to several million g/mol. The length of the polymer chain is also an important factor in determining its properties, as longer chains generally result in higher molecular weights and greater flexibility.

Further efforts will be concentrated on the part of these states
