

Overview

"The Tradition" by Jericho Brown is written from the perspective of a collective "we." This group planted colorful perennial flowers, including aster, nasturtium, and delphinium (Line 1). Almost the flowers they planted blooming, then watched this video on fast forward ("Sped the video to see blossoms / brought in seconds," Lines 11-12). At the end of the poem, the reader discovers that the collective "we" narrating the poem are Black men, and the sped-up video of flowers blooming is a metaphor for how state-sanctioned violence accelerated the death of Black people, especially Black men. The poem ends with the names of three Black men killed by the police: "John Crawford, Eric Garner, Mike Brown" (Line 16). As the title suggests, the poem is written in a traditional poetic form, the sonnet.

"The Tradition" was first published on August 7, 2015, about a year after the killings of Crawford, Garner, and Brown. It was published as part of the Academy of American Poets' Poem-a-Day series, which included Jericho Brown's comments on the work.

The poet's relationship to language and form is an induction where what's past is present, a video on loop. Not watching won't erase what that poem says about our future go away. (Brown, Jericho. "The Tradition," Poets.org)

Following its initial publication in 2015, "The Tradition" became the title poem for Brown's 2019 book, a collection which won the 2020 Pulitzer Prize in Poetry.
