Abstract

On 10 May 1997, the Journal of the American Medical Association published a study by the National Cancer Institute (NCI) that showed that the use of tamoxifen in the treatment of breast cancer was associated with an increased risk of developing a second primary cancer. The study was a retrospective analysis of data from the NCI's Surveillance, Epidemiology, and End Results (SEER) program, which tracks cancer incidence and mortality in the United States. The study found that women who had taken tamoxifen for at least one year had a 1.5-fold increased risk of developing a second primary cancer compared to women who had not taken tamoxifen. The second primary cancers were most commonly found in the lungs, stomach, and colon. The study also found that the risk of developing a second primary cancer was higher for women who had taken tamoxifen for a longer duration of time. There are several reasons why the results of this study may be limited. First, the study was conducted in a single center, which may limit the generalizability of the findings. Second, the study was a cross-sectional study, which may limit the ability to establish causality. Third, the study did not include a control group, which may limit the ability to compare the results to a baseline. Finally, the study did not include a long-term follow-up, which may limit the ability to assess the long-term effects of the intervention.
