

company's accomplishments, investment thesis and vision for the firm's future in the best and brightest light.

Moreover, opportunity now exists to spread a company's investor communications, including the annual report, further than ever before. Investors who find a report they like can quickly and easily share it with thousands of like-minded people. Of course, that speed of transmission is a double-edged sword: weak reports can spread just as quickly and easily as strong ones.

Amplifying the power of the web is the enhanced user experience of the individual social media outlets, from Facebook, LinkedIn, blogs and Twitter to content-sharing platforms like YouTube, SlideShare and Docstoc. For the first time, the individual has the true power to become your company's evangelist by sharing your materials with his or her friends and followers. In other words, social media are not just about how the IRO tells the company's story; they are also concerned with how non-affiliated third parties spread the story.

As the cover of Pulte Homes' annual report makes clear, the company wants to emphasize a CSR message. On the front page, one of the company's homes is shown surrounded by trees, with a tagline reading: 'Delivering on a responsible strategy'.

Over the last three years, the evolution of the web has clearly accelerated. Facebook opened to the public in September 2006, the same year Twitter was created. A March 2009 report from Nielsen Online shows 67 percent of the global online population uses social networks and blogs, up from 58 percent in March 2008. When it comes to spreading your message online, social media cannot be ignored. ●

Sustainable printing

With so many stakeholders connected through social networks, corporate reputations have become more and more fragile. One way to boost your credentials is to print your annual report using environmentally friendly paper and printers.

The Forest Stewardship Council (FSC), an independent, not-for-profit organization, certifies that your paper has come from a sustainable source. Safeway, Medtronic and Regency are all companies that have printed their annual reports on paper certified by the FSC.
