

Federalist 10

- What is the main topic? What issue/problem is the author (Madison) trying to address?

The instability of the current council in the US colonies; complaints from the public in response to the government being unstable; public goods are being neglected in replacement of the rivaling parties; decisions being made by the interest of the majority instead of the good of a people

- How does Madison define a faction?
 - What is the oldest and most common faction?

Number of citizens who are united, actuated by a common printerest and passion, and against the general benefits of a larger community; destroy the liberty (essential to its existence) or give all citizens same options; most common and oldest the unequal distribution of property

- What are the possible solutions to factions Madison explores?
 - Which solutions does he reject? Why?

Creating a democracy, as it is more privy to danger, turbulence, and is incompatible with the security of people

- Which solutions does he endorse? Why?

The creation of a republic, as all points in apure democracy

- What are the differences between a Democracy and Republic?
 - How does he define a Democracy?

Society consisting of small number of citizens who create and lead a government itself

- How does he define a Republic?

Government when representation takes place and promises a cure to their solution

- Which does Madison prefer? Why?

Republic, because it is safer that the decisions of a government is set into a smaller amount of people and the factious majority is unable to betray the wishes of a people.

- What does Madison ultimately conclude? What solution does he propose to the problem he tries to address?

Madison concludes that a republic is the best solution to a faction. "Republican remedy for diseases to republican government"
