

- i. Example: Ask students to develop a plan to improve the environment around their school as part of a unit on natural resources and conservation.
 - c. Inquiry/Discovery Learning: providing students guiding questions about a learning situation and allowing them to discover information independently.
 - i. Example: Students are given a guiding question that can be answered by observational evidence about a topic such as processes in the natural world, equipped with necessary background knowledge, and guided through experimental investigation.
 - d. Scaffolding is a key component to using these instructional methods effectively. Scaffolding is the continual adjustment of the level of help learners receive in response to their performance. Teachers can scaffold in a variety of ways, such as modeling, adjusting the level of questioning, and offering hints or cues throughout instruction. The basis of the idea is just like buildings need support while under construction; students do too.
 - e. Social psychologist, Lev Vygotsky developed the idea of the zone of proximal development, a key element of constructivist theory of learning.
 - a. The center circle represents what the learner can do independently, without any support or aid. The outer ring represents what the learner cannot do. The zone of proximal development lies between the two, representing what the learner can do with guidance, or scaffolding. This is where the teacher should act as an instructor, with the goal of moving students to the independent level.
 - f. Constructivism is the learning theory all about building knowledge through experience.
- v) Behaviorism and Instruction:
1. Behaviorism is a learning theory rooted in the notion that all behaviors are learned through interaction with the environment. Behaviorists believe that learning occurs when behavior changes are acquired through associations between stimuli and responses. Conditioning is the process through which behaviors are learned through interaction with the environment is called.
 2. There are 2 types:
 - a. Classical Conditioning (also known as Pavlovian conditioning) is a learning process that occurs when a positive stimulus is paired with a neutral stimulus and repeated. Then the positive stimulus is removed, and the neutral stimulus has the same effect. For example, the Russian physiologist Ivan Pavlov rang a bell each time he fed his dog. After a while, the dog associated eating
