^a The number of subjects who were included in the analysis of the effect of the intervention on the primary outcome (mean number of days off work) was 100 (50 in the intervention group and 50 in the control group). The number of subjects who were included in the analysis of the effect of the intervention on the secondary outcome (mean number of days off work due to musculoskeletal problems) was 98 (49 in the intervention group and 49 in the control group).

CONCLUSIONS The results of this study suggest that the use of a single, standardized, and validated questionnaire is a feasible and reliable method for assessing the prevalence of occupational stress in a large, multi-site, multi-national sample of health care workers. The findings also suggest that the prevalence of occupational stress is high in this population, and that the prevalence is similar across sites and countries. The findings also suggest that the prevalence of occupational stress is higher in health care workers who are employed in the intensive care unit than in those who are employed in the general ward. The findings also suggest that the prevalence of occupational stress is higher in health care workers who are employed in the intensive care unit than in those who are employed in the general ward.
