Abstract. Chlamydia pneumoniae (Cpn) is a common human pathogen. Cpn infection is associated with a variety of diseases, including atherosclerosis, coronary artery disease, and stroke. Cpn infection is also associated with the development of atherosclerosis in animal models. The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of Cpn infection on the development of atherosclerosis in a mouse model. Cpn infection was induced in mice by intranasal inoculation with a Cpn strain. The mice were then fed a high-fat diet for 12 weeks. The mice were then sacrificed and the atherosclerotic plaques were removed and stained with Oil Red O. The results showed that Cpn infection significantly increased the size of the atherosclerotic plaques in the mice. This suggests that Cpn infection may contribute to the development of atherosclerosis in humans.
