This revises Q&A 09-028.

Only active Q&As may be used as guidance in the adjudication of a current claim.

Brief Question: Please provide guidance regarding the evaluation of migraine headaches.

Detailed Question:

The regulations state that we cannot establish a disabling condition based on symptoms alone. According to the medical literature, there are no laboratory findings or clinical signs to substantiate the presence of migraine headaches in most cases. The diagnosis of migraine headache is usually established through patients' reported symptoms (pain, photophobia, nausea). Previous guidance from the Office of Disability from the early 1990's stated that, although migraine headaches that are disabling for 12 continuous months in spite of treatment are extremely rare, there are some cases that do not respond to treatment. The guidance said to consider whether the impairment medically equals listing 11.03 based on "altered awareness."

Our questions are:

What criteria should we use to determine that migraine headaches are a medically determinable impairment (MDI)? Is a diagnosis from an acceptable medical source sufficient, even if it is based only on a claimant's reported symptoms? If not, what evidence establishes the MDI?

If we use listing 11.03 to evaluate migraine headaches, should we use POMS DI 24580.001/Social Security Ruling (SSR) 87-06 to evaluate migraine headaches? If so, what constitutes appropriate treatment and an ongoing treatment relationship?

The POMS/SSR also say that we need a description of a seizure from professional observation or a third party. Does this guidance apply to migraine headaches?
