ABSTRACT

Quantum-dot cellular automata (QCA) gained a notable attraction in the emerging nanotechnology to get the better of power consumption, density, nanoscale design, the performance of the present CMOS technology. Many designs had been proposed in QCA for an arithmetic circuit like adder, divider, parity checker and comparator etc. Most of the designs have been facing the challenges of cost efficiency, power dissipation, device density etc. However, consideration of design automation, underlying clocking layout and integration of the sub-modules are the most important which has a direct impact on the fabrication of the design. This work proposed a novel cost efficient and power aware comparator design, which is an essential segment in central processing unit (CPU). The noticeable novelty of the design was the use of underlying regular clocking scheme. A new scalable, regular clocking scheme has been utilized in the comparator design of the comparator which enables regular or uniform cell layout of QCA circuit. It also exhibited the significant improvement over existing comparators having irregular clocking in terms of area and latency. QCA Designer was used to test and verify the functionality of the circuit and by using QCAPro the power dissipation has been analyzed.

1. INTRODUCTION

Several technologies, such as carbon nanotube based field effect transistor, resonant tunnelling diode and quantum-dot cellular automata (QCA) have been emerged to replace the complicated CMOS technology as predicted in the previous part [1, 2]. Among them, QCA technology provide a favourable case to beat the limits of CMOS [3, 4]. It offers a new paradigm introduced in [5] for faster computation [6], ultra low power consuming [7, 8], work at nano-scale and information propagation by the property of arranging cells together in place of transistors as in case of CMOS technology [9–11]. QCA does not supply voltage levels to generate logic states rather it uses an electron pair for the same [5, 12]. A QCA cell is made of four number of quantum-dots, where the diagonal placement of two electrons defines the polarization state of the cell, either +1 (logic 0) or -1 (logic 1).
