The main question raised in this edited volume is the following: Are meso- or macro-characteristics of educational systems the causes of educational inequality? In the concluding chapter of the book the editor answers this question in two ways and at the same time summarises the main lesson learnt through the sixteen chapters.

On the one hand the answer is negative: at maximum they [meso- or macro-characteristics of educational systems] are not at the root of inequality of education. Individual characteristics of pupils and parents are far more influential than any of the meso- or macro-characteristics. On the other hand, the answer is positive: unequal educational opportunities get only their form within these features and these inequalities can vary by the educational system in which it develops ... Individual potentials and constraints and opportunities stemming from the surrounding contexts are interacting with each other in a constant process of adaptation and change. (p. 326)

The book is divided into three main parts. Part I deals with institutional arrangements and educational outcomes and comprises three chapters. One chapter deals with the influence of educational segregation on educational achievement, another chapter explores difference-in-differences in PIRLS¹, TIMSS² and PISA³ data, while a third chapter looks at educational expansion and social class returns to tertiary qualifications in post-communist countries. Part II deals with migration and educational inequality and comprises four chapters. They deal with educational gaps
