Changing Seasons Barbara A. Coe, 2006-08-23 How are the lives of people in former Communist countries now As these transitional countries struggle from totalitarian communist to democratic capitalist are people's lives improved if not idyllic Before going to Armenia a former republic Soviet Union to teach public administration to university students I had no idea about life there I barely knew where the country was Many friends and family thought I was crazy a woman sixty years old with a good job leaving the relative ease of the United States and going off alone to a poor foreign country As it turned out joining the Civic Education Project was a wise decision launching me on a profound journey both inner and outer The journey was characterized by surprise shock and amazement by loss grief and self doubt by wonder laughter love and pleasure and ultimately by a sense of emerging wholeness and growing confidence that I can muddle through most situations that I meet in life Such a journey isn't for everyone but for me it was a remarkable opportunity for learning more about life and living Each new season of the school year brought change The city my apartment my work my circle of friends changed radically sometimes in ways that I liked sometimes in ways I didn't The change I experienced most keenly though was the internal change brought by the struggle to cope with external circumstances while at the same time keeping my sights on my true aspirations My hope is that this account will enable the reader to glimpse the charm and quirks of Armenia at this stage to understand some of the challenges of the transition and at the same time to experience how personal change can be fostered by throwing oneself into a foreign environment
