Britain: Parliament: House of Commons: Home Affairs Committee, 2012-09-21 This report concludes that the blame for G4S s failure to come up with the required venue security staff rests firmly and solely with the company itself A combination of flawed management information and poor communication with applicants and staff mean that G4S senior management had no idea how badly wrong their operation was going until it was too late to retrieve it G4S continued to give false reassurances based on poor quality data to LOCOG the Home Office and other partners involved in the operation until a very late stage in the process G4S should therefore forego its 57 million management fee to send a strong signal to the British taxpayer its biggest client in the UK that it is serious about making good for its mistakes G4S should also make ex gratia payments by way of apology to those applicants who successfully completed the training and accreditation process but were not scheduled for work because of their management s failings The Committee also recommended that for future major events armed forces personnel should be considered as possible security providers from the outset rather than just a backup with appropriate recognition and reward for the personnel concerned The Government should also maintain a central register of high risk companies who have failed in the delivery of public services to inform future procurement decisions
