

In addition to the numerous temples of the Maya, there is the presence of the chacras, or small agricultural fields, which were the main source of food during the pre-Columbian period. The Maya, who had a highly developed agriculture, were able to produce enough food to support a large population. The Maya also had a highly developed system of irrigation, which allowed them to grow crops in the dry season. The Maya also had a highly developed system of transportation, which allowed them to move goods and people over long distances. The Maya also had a highly developed system of communication, which allowed them to share information over long distances. The Maya also had a highly developed system of government, which allowed them to organize their society into a complex hierarchy. The Maya also had a highly developed system of art and culture, which allowed them to create some of the most beautiful and enduring works of art in the world.
