Abstract: This is an experimental study on determining whether a gender-specific approach to the treatment of depression is more effective than a gender-neutral approach. The study was conducted with 100 participants, 50 men and 50 women, who were randomly assigned to either a gender-specific or a gender-neutral treatment group. The results showed that the gender-specific treatment group had significantly higher rates of remission and lower rates of relapse compared to the gender-neutral treatment group. These findings suggest that a gender-specific approach to the treatment of depression may be more effective than a gender-neutral approach.
