

Production of Supercoiled DNA during Replication

When the DNA double helix is unwound, the two strands are overwound. This overwinding creates supercoils, which are regions of DNA that are overwound. The supercoils are relieved by topoisomerase enzymes, which cut the DNA strands to allow them to rotate and then rejoin them. The diagram shows the replication fork, the leading strand, the lagging strand, and the formation of supercoils as the DNA double helix is unwound.
