Abstract

[illegible]

Blackburn's communications system in Berlin consists of two headquarters of Red Grouped German Workers' Party, comprising members assigned to the general and Red Group units in accordance with the need of the situation, and those assigned for administrative and technical functions. The various units always act for the general Red Group. Information, other necessary material, is for immediate communication to the general Red Group. These units are small groups within the general Red Group, comprising from approximately 100 to 200 members.

Multi-level management systems, in general, are preferred whenever systems must be able to perform under uncertainty. But to reap the benefits of these systems, the effort of developing them must be commensurate with the benefits they will provide. For example, the cost of developing a multi-level system may be prohibitive if the system is to be used only occasionally or if the system is to be used in a situation where the cost of making a mistake is negligible. In such cases, a single-level system may be more appropriate. The cost of developing a multi-level system may also be prohibitive if the system is to be used in a situation where the cost of making a mistake is negligible. In such cases, a single-level system may be more appropriate. The cost of developing a multi-level system may also be prohibitive if the system is to be used in a situation where the cost of making a mistake is negligible. In such cases, a single-level system may be more appropriate.
