

Abstract — A qualitative telephone study, through a primary care physician, of 100 patients at a community health center. The study was designed to determine the prevalence of self-reported depression and to explore the barriers to seeking help for depression. The prevalence of self-reported depression was 10.0%. The barriers to seeking help for depression were: lack of knowledge of where to go for help, lack of transportation, lack of insurance, and lack of time. The study suggests that a primary care physician should be trained to recognize and treat depression, and that a community health center should provide a referral service for patients with depression.

the authors' view, the importance of the social context in which the research is conducted is often underestimated. The authors argue that the social context is a key factor in determining the validity of the research. They suggest that the social context can influence the results of the research in a number of ways. First, the social context can influence the selection of the research topic. Second, the social context can influence the selection of the research methods. Third, the social context can influence the interpretation of the results. The authors conclude that the social context is a key factor in determining the validity of the research and that it should be taken into account in all research.
