

Blackburne, 1997, p. 123: "Black and Shapere's (1996) book is a very welcome contribution to the philosophy of science and philosophy of biology."

But as things are, evolutionary developmental biology has been left out of modern biology. It has been, in particular, ignored when biology has been taken to be the study of the organism. This is because the focus was evolutionary, and could not get beyond that. It just had to be said that, "The organism is the basic unit of biological study, and, clearly, evolution is the study of the organism's history, and the study of the organism's history is the study of the organism's development."

So, evolution, which is the study of the organism's history, is the study of the organism's development.

But this is not the only way to look at the organism and its development. The organism is also a system, and the study of the organism's history is the study of the organism's system. Evolutionary developmental biology is the study of the organism's system, and the study of the organism's system is the study of the organism's development.
