Following recently published research in the United States, a consensus was reached regarding the expected financial life-cycle results from the capital stock of electricity by the industry. It is being generally accepted that the production of electric energy entails considerable costs and, therefore, the production of electricity may require more government support, particularly in the form of tax breaks, than most other industrial sectors. It is also the interest of many regions in the United States to attract investment in power generation capacity, in order to take advantage of many federal incentives of the tax and credit systems.
