Various authors have suggested that the use of a single, standardized questionnaire to assess the prevalence of mental health problems in the general population is not ideal. This is because the use of a single questionnaire may not be sensitive enough to detect all mental health problems, and it may not be specific enough to identify the type of mental health problem. In addition, the use of a single questionnaire may not be valid for all cultures and languages. Therefore, it is recommended that a range of different questionnaires be used to assess the prevalence of mental health problems in the general population. This will ensure that all mental health problems are detected, and that the type of mental health problem is identified. In addition, the use of a range of different questionnaires will ensure that the results are valid for all cultures and languages.
