1. Identify the problem. The first step is to identify the problem. This involves understanding the symptoms and the context in which they are occurring.

RESEARCH The authors conducted a cross-sectional study of 1,000 U.S. adults, including 100 who were HIV positive. They found that 10% of the HIV-positive group had a history of injection drug use, compared with 1% of the HIV-negative group. The authors also found that the HIV-positive group was more likely to have a history of injection drug use than the HIV-negative group, regardless of whether they were currently injecting drugs.

3. Representations of the domain (e.g. the following):
 - Graphical (e.g. bar chart)
 - Tabular (e.g. table)

 - Diagrammatic (e.g. flow chart)
 - Textual (e.g. written description)
 - Graphical (e.g. bar chart)
 - Tabular (e.g. table)
- These representations can be used to help students understand the problem and to help them find a solution. They can also be used to help students communicate their solution to others.
- For example, a student might use a bar chart to represent the data in a problem. They might then use a flow chart to show how they solved the problem. Finally, they might use a written description to explain their solution to others.
- By using these representations, students can better understand the problem and find a solution. They can also communicate their solution to others more effectively.
- Therefore, it is important for students to learn how to use these representations. This will help them to become more effective problem solvers and communicators.
- There are many ways to teach students how to use these representations. One way is to provide them with examples of how to use them. Another way is to have them practice using them on their own. A third way is to have them work in groups and help each other learn how to use them.
- Whatever method is used, it is important that students learn how to use these representations. This will help them to become more effective problem solvers and communicators.

Types of Evidence

Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week, 1000 kcal energy deficit diet on the body composition and physical performance of 10 male triathletes. The subjects were divided into two groups: a control group (CG) and a diet group (DG). The CG maintained their current diet, while the DG reduced their energy intake by 1000 kcal per day. Body composition was measured using dual-energy X-ray absorptiometry (DXA) at baseline and 12 weeks. Physical performance was assessed using a triathlon time trial. The results showed that the DG lost significantly more weight and fat mass than the CG. There was no significant change in lean mass for either group. The DG also showed a significant improvement in triathlon performance compared to the CG. These findings suggest that a 1000 kcal energy deficit diet for 12 weeks can lead to significant weight and fat mass loss, and improved triathlon performance in male triathletes.
