Ridgway,2018-07-11 American democracy has fascinated generations of historians They have probed its philosophical foundations and the structure of its institutions but their studies reveal little about those who really wielded power in the formative years of the republic. Employing a sophisticated research design, Whitman Ridgway examines the changing leadership patterns in four diverse communities in Maryland from 1790 to 1840. The results indicate clearly the need to study the American democratic process at the local level. Ridgway selected Baltimore City, Frederick, St. Marys, and Talbot counties representing the underlying economic and cultural diversity of one political culture in Maryland to evaluate who governed how these patterns differed from one community to another and how such patterns changed over time. The research design defines the scope of the study. Ridgway uses the decisional method of analysis, determining who actually made decisions in order to identify the political leaders. His extensive research in manuscript and newspaper collections, tax and census data, and religious and genealogical records gathered information on some 1,300 persons. This study of community power illuminates facets of a democratic society which perplexed Alexis de Tocqueville over a century ago. Ridgway demonstrates that despite the expansion of popular participation in political affairs, the influence of the wealthy continued to be significant. He shows also how leaders without benefit of wealth or social ties to the oligarchies were able to enter community decision making. In a more modern context, this important book adds to the literature in several ways. Its greatest contribution is methodological: no longer can historians talk about power relationships without studying them directly. The work also compares two important periods, the first and second party eras, normally treated in isolation, and through this comparison it reveals much about democracy, egalitarianism, and power. Multisite Evaluation Practice: Lessons and Reflections From Four Cases Frances Lawrenz, 2011-04-19. Multisite evaluation settings differ from the single settings common to research on evaluation use. In addition to the primary intended users, there is another important group of potential evaluation users in settings where government agencies or large national or international foundations fund multisite projects: project leaders and local evaluators. If each project site is expected to take part in or support the overall program evaluation, then these individuals frequently serve as links between their projects and the larger cross-project evaluation of the funded program. The field has not until now addressed the topic of how being asked or required to participate in such evaluations affects these people who play a critical role in multisite evaluations. This issue does so in two ways. The first six chapters present data and related analyses from research on four multisite evaluations documenting the patterns of involvement in these evaluation projects and the extent to which different levels of involvement in program evaluations resulted in different patterns of evaluation use and influence. The remaining chapters offer reflections on the results of the cases or their implications, some by people who were part of the original research and some by those who were not The goal is to encourage readers to think actively about ways to improve multisite evaluation practice This is the 129th volume of the Jossey Bass quarterly report series New Directions for Evaluation an official publication of the American Evaluation Association Professional Service Across the Field of Education Joy Egbert, Mary F.
