✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Introduction

The understanding of the self originates from social interactions and evaluations of behaviours, character traits, interests, and other patterns of thinking, acting and feeling. This knowledge defines human identities. However, the identities emerge after making comparisons with socially defined values, norms, and behaviours. Some of the most important social institutions are the family and schools. On average, humans spend most of their lifespan at home or school. Despite the work environments taking most of the adult lifespan, the crucial development stages occur at home and school. The interactions in these institutions create continuities, uniqueness, or affiliations. Humans imitate or defy the social attributes to build their identities. The research explores the influence of social institutions in defining human identities.

Identity and Social Institutions

My father is a real estate agent while my mother works as a clerk in a convenient store. I have two siblings comprising an older sister and a younger brother. My father is the head of the family, and he is involved in most of the major decisions while my mother does most of the household chores after work. However, my father sometimes helps in the kitchen. In fact, he has been encouraging us to carry out different tasks including kitchen chores and mowing our background lawn.

The school offers different experience including the relationships with other races, gender, and age. It brings together different characters that have different skills and exposure to different social and cultural backgrounds. My best friends, Andy and Rafael, belong to different races. In fact, Rafael is black while Andy is half Mexican. Every person has unique characteristics that are derived from their races and cultural backgrounds.
