Abstract

As the temperature decreases, the rate of convection within the mantle will also decrease. This could be the immediate reason there is no global magnetic field on Venus, but even if the mantle is convecting, the planet's core may not be big enough to produce a significant portion of its field. Venus's convective envelope is a maximum 40 to 50 kilometers thick. About the same as the thickness of planetary atmospheres of 40 to 50 kilometers. The two spheres are the same size, but the planet has no magnetic field, while the other has one. The size of the convective envelope may control the size of the planet's field. The size of the convective envelope may also be the primary determinant of the field's magnetic structure and speed. The structure will be regular in some and more irregular in others.
