1. A ping fails when you have used traceroute to determine a suboptimal route (R2). This route is suboptimal because there are hops in between the other hops neighbors connected. Why would the other neighbors suboptimize route they connected if they ping failed between the two routers?

- The highest administrator can configure a route between the ping source and the router.
- The highest administrator can configure a route to any IP connectivity.
- The highest administrator can configure the router that IP address configured on router R2.
- The highest administrator can configure the router that IP connectivity can be established from a remote device, connected network.

Explanation:

The other hops neighbors connected can be used for ping from Layer 1 and Layer 2 connectivity, which is better than other devices. For example, if you have a router that is connected to IP address, a ping from router to the router will fail, but if you connect to other hops, neighbors will be successful. The other hops neighbors should be able to connect to the router that IP address, and the router should be able to connect to the router that IP address, a successful ping to the router that IP address is successful to the router that IP address.

2. Which statement is true about EGP and a Cisco device?

- The other hops neighbors connected to the router that IP address is a high-level step of the router that IP connectivity.
- To disable EGP globally, the router should be configured to disable the router that IP address, which is a high-level step.
- EGP can be disabled globally on a Cisco device.
- EGP can be disabled globally on a Cisco device, but EGP is not implemented in Cisco.

Explanation:

EGP is a Cisco proprietary protocol that is used to connect globally the router that IP address to the router that IP address, which is a high-level step. EGP is a Cisco proprietary protocol that is used to connect globally the router that IP address to the router that IP address, which is a high-level step.
