10. The most important reason to study is to better prepare the new generation. The question on this prompt better fits the category of "preparation" and not of "education." It asks the student to prepare themselves for the world. There are many responses to this question, which are all valid. Some students may say that they want to be successful in the future, and that is a valid reason. Others may say that they want to be able to help others, and that is also a valid reason. The key is to make sure that the student is able to articulate a clear and concise answer to the question.

■ This question, like this paper, is a challenge to a discipline, not to think, across years. Two different questions, whether mathematics is a discipline, or, alternatively, whether it is a discipline, are not the same. This paper is about self- and other-organizing systems, and about their properties.
