

Similarities of short stories, poetry and drama

4 pages | 814 words

Narratives, poetry and drama are different types of literature but they share much of the exact same elements. A few of the lots of aspects shared are figures of speech, conflict, foreshadowing. Among the exact same components short stories, poetry and drama have is setting. "The setting of a work of fiction establishes its historical, geographical, and physical context." (pg. 251.) Setting can likewise be important simply put stories, poetry and drama due to the fact that setting "incorporates a variety physical and cultural components." (pg.251.) An example of setting in poems, plays, or narratives composed in the Anglo-Saxon period or Renaissance without understanding the setting it is challenging to understand the cultural element poems, plays, or narrative. The setting can include attitude to a narratives, poetry and drama, an example is how mindsets have changed towards females, and African Americans. Narratives, and plays have storytellers, however poems have voice who is the poems speaker. The speaker is a persona that the poet produces. A storyteller is "an individual who tells the story." The storyteller or voice can set the tone for the poem or play; if they are sarcastic then the play story or poem is ironical, however if they are severe then the tone is severe. The storyteller is different than a voice due to the fact that storytellers can be undependable or dependable. An undependable storyteller is "somebody who misrepresents or misinterprets events".(pg.80) A trusted storyteller is "somebody who accurately explains events." (pg.80) The narrator or the voice can set the tone of the story or the poem. The tone "communicates the speaker's attitude toward his or her subject or audience." (pg.709) For example if the storyteller or the voice is major the play, story, or the poem is major, but is the narrator or the voice is cheerful than the play, story, or the poem is cheerful. Allegory, myth and symbol are some another elements short stories, poetry and drama have in common. "An allegory is a story with two parallel meanings, one is figuratively and the other is literal." An allegories is often used by writers in short stories, poetry and drama to give their writing a deeper meaning and can be use to teach readers or viewers a lesson. A myth is "anonymous story reflecting the religious and social values of the time often involving god and heroes. The Greeks often used myths in their stories and plays they often wrote about their gods and heroes. Myth is often is used in poetry, writers often write poems about god. There are plays that use cosmic irony this is where the gods of fate cause events to happen. A symbol is used in writing to repents something that stands for or suggests something else by relationship, or association. Blood is an example of a symbol used in play, story, or the poem it can symbolize menstruation or death. Foreshadowing is often used in short stories, poetry and drama. Foreshadowing is used early in a story of situations to hint of things to come. Foreshadowing can be used in poetry in the title to give the...
