Jöns Jakob Berzelius (1779–1848) not only coined the terms “organic” and “inorganic,” but also invented the system of chemical symbols still used today. He published the first list of accurate atomic weights and proposed the idea that atoms carry an electric charge. He purified or discovered the elements cerium, selenium, silicon, thorium, titanium, and zirconium.

German chemist Friedrich Wöhler (1800–1882) began his professional life as a physician and later became a professor of chemistry at the University of Göttingen. Wöhler codiscovered the fact that two different chemicals could have the same molecular formula. He also developed methods of purifying aluminum—at the time, the most expensive metal on Earth—and beryllium.

To stay alive, early humans must have been able to tell the difference between two kinds of materials in their world. “You can live on roots and berries,” they might have said, “but you can’t live on dirt. You can stay warm by burning tree branches, but you can’t burn rocks.”

By the eighteenth century, scientists thought they had grasped the nature of that difference, and in 1807, Jöns Jakob Berzelius gave names to the two kinds of materials. Compounds derived from living organisms were believed to contain an unmeasurable vital force—the essence of life. These he called “organic.” Compounds derived from minerals—those lacking that vital force—were “inorganic.”

Because chemists could not create life in the laboratory, they assumed they could not create compounds with a vital force. With this mind-set, you can imagine how surprised chemists were in 1828 when Friedrich Wöhler produced urea—a compound known to be excreted by mammals—by heating ammonium cyanate, an inorganic mineral.

For the first time, an “organic” compound had been obtained from something other than a living organism and certainly without the aid of any kind of vital force. Clearly, chemists needed a new definition for “organic compounds.” Organic compounds are now defined as compounds that contain carbon.

Why is an entire branch of chemistry devoted to the study of carbon-containing compounds? We study organic chemistry because just about all of the molecules that
