- There is no risk to avoid the change when the change and management process are the center of responsibility
- There is no cost and need to track the project cost, as with some costly risks you can do the change
- The change was made by the "I" individual person in the organization
- The change (individual) information technology requirement can be changed
- If the change results in success, all you have done was the risk reduction, not a gain. If you made performance an opportunity with the change, you have lost it. (L.A. 1)
