Background and purpose: We have revised the previous EFNS guidelines on neuropathic pain (NP) assessment, which aimed to provide recommendations for the diagnostic process, screening tools and questionnaires, quantitative sensory testing (QST), micro-neurography, pain-related reflexes and evoked potentials, functional neuroimaging and skin biopsy.

Methods: We have checked and rated the literature published in the period 2004–2009, according to the EFNS method of classification for diagnostic procedures.

Results: Most of the previous recommendations were reinforced by the new studies. The main revisions relate to: (i) the new definition of NP and a diagnostic grading system; (ii) several new validated clinical screening tools that identify NP components, and questionnaires which assess the different types of NP; (iii) recent high-quality studies on laser-evoked potentials (LEPs) and skin biopsy.

Conclusions: History and bedside examination are still fundamental to a correct diagnosis, whilst screening tools and questionnaires are useful in indicating probable NP. QST is also useful for indicating the latter, and to assess provoked pains and treatment response. Amongst laboratory tests, LEPs are the best tool for assessing Aδ pathway dysfunction, and skin biopsy for assessing neuropathies with distal loss of unmyelinated nerve fibres.

Background and objectives

Neuropathic pain (NP) is a major symptom which may be intractable in common neurological disorders such as neuropathy, spinal cord injury, multiple sclerosis and stroke. Pain is a complex sensation strongly modulated by cognitive influences, and understanding the underlying pathophysiological mechanisms in patients remains a challenge for pain specialists. The EFNS launched a task force that published guidelines for the assessment of NP to address an unmet clinical need [1]. The aim of this new task force was to revise the previous guidelines, in accord with evidence-based studies published thereafter. We have now performed so, drawing in part on similar work in this field by the NP special interest group (NeuPSIG) of the International Association for the Study of Pain (IASP).

Search methods

Search methods adhered to those used in previous guidelines [1] and complied with EFNS recommendations [2]. Briefly, after an initial search through the central database in the Cochrane Library, Medline, and other electronic databases (2004 to date), two task force participants were assigned to check the sorted material per method of assessment, i.e. screening tools and questionnaires, quantitative sensory testing (QST), micro-neurography, reflexes and evoked potentials, functional neuroimaging and skin biopsy. Pertinent studies were rated for evidence level according to EFNS rules [2] whenever applicable; in some instances, such as
