Abstract: Phragmites is a dominant wetland plant species in the coastal marshes of the United States. Phragmites is a highly invasive species that has been spreading rapidly in the coastal marshes of the United States. The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of Phragmites on the growth and survival of Spartina patens in the coastal marshes of the United States. The study was conducted in a coastal marsh in the state of Texas. The study area was divided into two sections: a control section and a Phragmites section. The control section was a natural Spartina patens marsh, and the Phragmites section was a Phragmites marsh. The study was conducted over a period of two years. The results of the study showed that Phragmites had a significant negative effect on the growth and survival of Spartina patens in the coastal marshes of the United States. The Phragmites section had a significantly lower biomass and a significantly lower survival rate than the control section. The results of the study suggest that Phragmites is a highly invasive species that should be controlled in the coastal marshes of the United States.
