

Simulation By Sheldon Ross Solution Manual

simulation. The program simulates the situation where all of the students have the same degree of knowledge and interest. The program then generates a random number for each student and checks whether the student's degree of knowledge is greater than the degree of interest. If the student's degree of knowledge is greater than the degree of interest, the student is accepted into the program. If the student's degree of knowledge is less than the degree of interest, the student is rejected. The program then prints the number of students accepted and the number of students rejected.

In this case, the program will print a number that is greater than the number of students accepted and less than the number of students rejected. This is because the program generates a random number for each student and checks whether the student's degree of knowledge is greater than the degree of interest. If the student's degree of knowledge is greater than the degree of interest, the student is accepted. If the student's degree of knowledge is less than the degree of interest, the student is rejected. The program then prints the number of students accepted and the number of students rejected.
