strategy Specifically this paper seeks to analyze Designated Players (DPs) in Major League Soccer (MLS) and see if DPs contribute more toward a team's on field success measured as win percentage or overall revenue Prior studies have analyzed soccer leagues across Europe and found that most teams follow win maximizing strategies over profit maximizing strategies This analysis has not yet been carried over to MLS which is not the most prevalent sports league in its home country and features a unique DP structure Match specific DP data was collected over the span of four MLS seasons from 2014 to 2017 while financial data was compiled from annual reports published by Forbes The data was analyzed through a series of linear regressions The results showed that DPs have a positive effect on both win percentage and team revenue and that DPs can explain a larger amount of the variation in team revenues than the variation in win percentage The results imply that teams in MLS may be signing DPs in order to maximize short term profits over long term on field successes Leaf 2

Profit-Maximizing Gate Revenue Sharing in Sports Leagues Thomas Peeters, 2015 In this article I examine how sports leagues can use gate revenue sharing to coordinate talent investments and maximize club profits Gate revenue sharing reduces incentives to invest in talent Initially lower investments boost profits because total costs go down but investing less also shrinks revenues which harms profits at higher levels of sharing The league maximizes profits by setting a sharing rule which balances these two effects Gate revenue sharing decreases talent investments more strongly in leagues with heterogeneous rather than homogeneous local market sizes As a result the profit maximizing level of sharing is higher for relatively homogeneous leagues This implies that more balanced leagues are expected to share more gate revenues than less balanced leagues It also explains why gate revenue sharing is widely used in the U S major leagues while it is largely absent in European soccer
