Posterior Composites: A Practical Guide Revisited

Abstract: Direct placement resin composite is revolutionizing the restoration of posterior teeth. Compared to amalgam, its use not only improves aesthetics but, more importantly, promotes a minimally invasive approach to cavity preparation. Despite the benefits, the use of composite to restore load-bearing surfaces of molar and premolar teeth is not yet universally applied. This may be due to individual practitioner concerns over unpredictability, time and the fact that procedures remain technique sensitive for many, particularly with regard to moisture control, placement and control of polymerization shrinkage stress. New materials, techniques and equipment are available that may help to overcome many of these concerns. This paper describes how such techniques may be employed in the management of a carious lesion on the occlusal surface of an upper molar.

Clinical Relevance: Direct posterior composite is the treatment of choice for the conservative restoration of primary carious lesions.

Dent Update 2012; 39: 211–216

Detection and diagnosis

A Class I carious lesion (ICDAS 3)¹ was detected in the mesial pit of an upper second molar (Figure 1). The lesion was diagnosed as active with respect to enamel cavitation exposing dentine. In addition the patient's dietary habits, oral hygiene measures and the presence of active lesions elsewhere indicated the need for operative intervention.

Isolation

Placement of direct restorations in the molar regions can present difficulty with regard to moisture control. Use of rubber dam with a single hole and a versatile winged molar clamp (Hygenic 124, Coltene-Whaledent, Switzerland)² provided rapid isolation, which was completed (Figure 2) by flossing the dam through the mesial contact point. The speed with which this technique achieves isolation and promotes a comfortable experience for the patient and a predictable outcome for the operator cannot be overemphasized. Although the vast majority of practitioners do not routinely use rubber dam,³ the isolation of a single tooth for an occlusal restoration is a perfect starting point for those wishing to learn and refine rubber dam techniques.

Occlusal template

As carious demineralization had left the occlusal surface virtually intact, in this case a template was used to facilitate provision of an anatomically accurate final restoration. Fabrication of a template may be achieved using a pre-operative impression gained by injecting a small amount of a clear polyvinyl siloxane material (Memosil 2, Heraeus Kulzer, Germany) onto the occlusal surface^{4,5} (Figure 3). After waiting for the material to partially set, finger pressure (Figure 4) was applied to accurately capture the occlusal morphology. Once set, the template was removed (Figure 5) and the mesial surface marked with a felt pen to assist orientation when reappplied later.
