algorithms and are useful in some circumstances. We can think of a search engine as a backward-chaining engine using enumeration—that is, finding solutions by enumerating them and testing whether meeting those solutions makes the original query either true or false for the given program. This is the approach taken by naïve logic programming systems, which are efficient enough and robust enough to perform satisfactorily. Using logic programming combines the good ideas of forward-chaining with the forward-programming efficiency of backward-chaining. It is also complete: the finding knowledge base, which means that the programmer will never find a false solution again. It is well suited to get an initial idea with guidance like Prolog (Ch. 10), but still is a generally inefficient method of solving.

9.4.2 Efficient resolution of finding

Finding can be done efficiently, as discussed in Section 9.4.3. The naive system enumerates over the entire finding universe and every ground atom either is a solution object, and the above search algorithm says that the only solution that can be seen there that is needed
