ENDORSEMENTS

I am delighted to recommend this volume which uncovers two important truths to the success of the UN

- 1 The critical role of civil society that makes the UN more humane
- 2 The important role of behavioral sciences in shaping UN policies to produce successful outcomes

Because of the UN we've not had a third world war yet Human Rights have expanded beyond belief of anyone who founded the UN 75 years ago

Bruce Knotts U S diplomat author and Chair of the U N DPI NGO Executive Committee

As this new volume describes the world is a better place because of the United Nations where most of the world comes together with diverse and lofty goals such as protecting the environment promoting health supporting equality and maintaining peace All of these major goals require interventions that sometimes maintain and sometimes change human behavior National and international policies need to be informed by the best available research in the behavioral sciences Our future depends on it

Diane F Halpern PhD Former President American Psychological Association

Attaining the United Nations 17 Sustainable Development Goals SDGs by 2030 is a formidable challenge that can be furthered by a foundation of solid evidence This book provides a base of relevant psychological knowledge that can inform policy and interventions in the achievement of those goals

Judith A Gibbons PhD Past President Interamerican Society of Psychology

The authors make a convincing case for the relevance of behavioral sciences to the work of the United Nations

Progress on women's rights preparing for and recovering from natural disasters adapting to climate change improving child well being and more all have behavioral dimensions These must be addressed for the UN to make progress on its goals

By chronicling the involvements of psychology and social work in the United Nations this volume will inspire students and practitioners to engage further in global work and advocacy

Lynne Healy PhD International Association of Schools of Social Work

Behavioral Science in the Global Arena a timely and significant volume about the role of psychologists at the UN addressing our contemporary social problems i.e. human rights social justice climate and environmental change

As Congress Takooshian and Asper demonstrate it is time for psychologists to move from their individual focus toward social change at a macro diverse and global focus following the UN's 17 sustainable development goals for 2030

We need to acknowledge changing population demographics growing mobility and aging in our population and recognize the continued gender inequities and disparities among migrants salient today

No longer can we simply consider psychology's role in the aftermath of disaster but to be proactive and on the forefront about counterterrorism climate change etc to promote global action so that we think and act together toward shared social change

Jean Lau Chin EdD ABPP Past President International Division American Psychological Association

As the UN celebrates its diamond anniversary it is fitting that thinkers in psychology provide critical insights into psychology's engagement with the UN SDG Agenda. The authors have carefully considered the UN from many vantage points especially behavioural. This important volume posits fresh ideas for psychology's role and future impact in the only global body that brings all governments together to tackle the social economic political and security factors that are essential for peace and collective human development in our fragile world.

Saths Cooper PhD Past President International Union of Psychological Scientists IUPsyS I am very excited to see the publication of a much needed book on the contribution of the behavioral sciences at the UN which highlights the role of social work. The editors have successfully illuminated how social workers have been increasingly involved in addressing international issues. Speaking as the current president of NASW member of the International Federation of Social Workers Executive and as a social work educator I am especially appreciative of the content on the long term involvement that social workers have had in the work of the UN. This book is a gift to students who are increasingly seeking to become involved in international social work. I am especially impressed by the editors commitment to promoting the professional development of students by having them co author the chapters in the book with both academics and UN leaders. Well done Kathryn Conley Wehrmann PhD LCSW President National Association of Social Workers NASW.
