Multi-state longitudinal studies are generally very expensive. Sometimes several years' data are gathered, leading to thousands of subjects. In some the subjects are tested only at specific time points, whereas others are tested just after specific happenings. Studying and collecting all this data without introducing errors and imbalances in the data set requires a lot of sophisticated software, and the testing itself tends to be complex. When an individual can respond to having or being tested, following and testing about a given topic, either the number of times, the responses, and the following questions vary.
